Leader of His Generation’s Art
Wayne White to Speak at Herron School of Art and Design January 26

Sometimes reality only seems to bite. For Wayne White, the realization that a degree in painting was not going to pay the bills when he moved to New York City in the early 80s led him in new directions. He gravitated to cartooning and illustrating, and as they say, “the rest is history”. Whether defined as a pop artist or surrealist, White is a leader of his generation’s art.

He caught the art world’s eye beginning with cartoons and illustrations in The East Village Eye, Raw, The New York Times and The Village Voice. He worked on Pee Wee’s Playhouse as a puppeteer and set designer, winning three Emmy® awards. He art directed the Big Time music video for Peter Gabriel and Tonight, Tonight for Smashing Pumpkins.

He began experimenting with landscapes by teaching himself oil-painting techniques. “The paintings started getting weirder and weirder,” he said in a 2007 Esquire interview. “I started putting monsters and stuff into them, but I kept the same realistic technique.” After further experimentation, White hit pay dirt.

He “put some words” directly on the painting. Friends were astounded at the boldness of the look. Today, his bold works of three-dimensional words over traditional bucolic scenery have the art world talking.

His book, Maybe Now I’ll Get the Respect I So Richly Deserve, co-authored with Todd Oldham, made its debut in an Ammo Books Popular Edition in June 2009. It’s described as “a welcome departure from the more-often-than-not self-aggrandizing art world”.

White’s appearance is supported through an endowment provided by the Christel DeHaan Family Foundation. Established in 2006, the Christel DeHaan Family Foundation Visiting Artist Lecture brings international artists, designers and scholars to Herron so that students and the broader public may have access to the wonder of the creative process. Previous lecturers in this series have included Julian Opie, Karl Wirsum, Mary Jane Jacob and Andrew Blauvelt.
